Indiscreet Discussion.

"Indiscreet discussion before young pupils of present international conditions, social and political; her defense of Bolshevism; her offer to instruct boys on the subject out of class: her advice to them to read certain named magazines which would give the other and correct side of the aims and precepts of that form of government; her advanced ideas on the subject of individual direction, and that such instruction was impressed upon immature youth with that added weight which a teacher's instruction always carries."

The writers of these letters gave the names of six pupils as the source of their information. When the board was informed these complaints it considered that direction. there were two courses of procedurea formal board investigation, which might result in trial, or an informal inquiry to establish whether the conditions were such as to warrant, in the discretionary power of the board and without formal investigation, the application of suitable discipline.

The latter course was decided upon certainly as a preliminary one, noth on Miss Wood's account and on account of the system, the board realising that public investigation and trut! should be most carefully entered upon, and, if possible, avoided, bccause of the friction in the system that is always engendered by such action, and also because of possible injustice to the party complained against.
